Peterson House

1908 "D. Peterson, proprietor of the "Hugo Heights Fruit Farm" was at the county seat, Saturday, and in conservation with the Courier man he remarked that as yet there has been no killing frost at his place, near Hugo and as it is now nearly the middle of January, he thinks Jack Frost will have to watch out or he may forget that favored spot entirely. Mr. Peterson was formerly a railroad man, but he never regrets the day when he decided to leave the iron horse and delve in mother earth and get an orchard started. He finds it not only healthier and more enjoyable in every respect, but vastly more remunerative. He has ideal peach land and proposes to make a record with this variety of fruit."

Hugo Heights Fruit Farm: Peaches & Apples

Daniel Peterson eventually specialized in peaches and apples. The Hugo Heights Fruit Farm, and other orchards, in Hugo would become famous for their fruit ⁴

Water for the house came from a pipe laid from a concrete cistern located in a wetland/spring approximately a quarter mile in length uphill to the northwest. A cistern is an artificial underground tank for holding water or other liquid, especially a tank for catching and storing spring water.⁵

The cistern has several inscriptions on it. One is "D. P. 4-29-14". Another might have been done with a small bullet shell, perhaps a twenty-two shell. It has the same date and other names that can not be read, perhaps Hugo. They might be the names of folks that worked on the concrete cistern. Hugo Garbers died in 1912. "D. P. 4-29-14" was thought to mean that Daniel Peterson built the cistern April 29, 1914.⁵

There was enough gravity and quantity to supply water to the vineyard and the sink in their house. Wayne McKy estimated that in early September 2008 there was probably four to five gallons a minute coming from the cistern and spring.⁵
